Last year I visited a small village near the city of Gloucester, England, where a very special day and unusual race takes place once a year. It's called "Cooper's Hill Cheese-Rolling". On a Saturday at the beginning of spring, people from all over the world, go to Cooper's Hill to see the race. The first written information about the race was in a message sent to the local government in 1826 So nobody knows when it really started. Each year, the event becomes more and more popular with people coming from all over the world to take part and to watch The way the race works is as follows. There is a very large piece of cheese, which is round, like a wheel, and weighs about 4 kilograms One of the people in charge of the event sends the large piece of cheese down the hill and half a second later everyone taking part runs down the hill after the cheese In the past, the cheese has hit people watching the race and injured them. It's not just the spectators who get injured; many of the people running down the hill get serious injuries, too. The injuries are usually broken ankles and legs as the runners lose control coming down the steep hill There are also lots of local people helping to catch the runners, so they don't fall over and hurt themselves; they are called catchers.
This event become so famous that it appears on television all over the world on the BBC network and also on Trans World

This event become so famous that it appears on television all over the world on the BBC network and, also, on Trans World Sport. People watching this event think it is very strange and that the people taking part are crazy.
